Adobe Photoshop is a range of digital imaging software that allows the user to manipulate images and create new ones. It is used to create all different types of output, such as: images printed on paper images seen on a computer screen photos on social media photographs that people use to take with their smart phones If you're reading this on a mobile phone, read on for the best image editing apps. Adobe Photoshop is not an app that can be run without a computer. You need a computer to run it. "It is not a stand-alone app." - Adobe The program has had many different names over time. It was created in 1987 by two artists who were trying to create a software package to edit images for the Macintosh. It was originally called Photoshop. After that, it was bought by a firm called Macromedia, who had just created a rival graphics editor called Macromedia Flash. The company needed to give their new program a more professional look. They renamed it PhotoShop, because that was how they saw it: as a photo editing software. The rest, as they say, is history. 2. The image editor The app includes tools for creating artwork, like art and vector graphics. It's used for creating and making some common creative elements like logos, illustrations, and cliparts. It also has features for other specialised topics like product photography and digitally-captured photography. Adobe Photoshop is highly complex and can be very overwhelming. This is because of the large amount of options you can use to create images and other edits. I recommend trying it out when you have some spare time. Q: Why does the HTTP server uses the check header option when it is used to check that the request is ok and not a fake one? i know that http is an application layer protocol but i would like to know why does the HTTP server checks if the request is coming from the expected server or not? for example, when the client sends the request it includes the check header to verify that the request is coming from the expected server, what if in this case the client sends a fake request? does the HTTP server then checks to verify if the client is trying to hack its origin server? A: In modern web-based application attacks the nature of the request has changed. Malicious clients don't send fake headers. They make what appear to be legitimate requests, but in reality they're sending crafted requests that look like they're coming from the expected origin. A response to the request can then contain a particular payload, which might be the result of a successful attack. If the response contains the expected payload, the client uses this as evidence that the request was not crafted and is authentic. If the response doesn't contain the expected payload, the client can use this to detect that the request was probably crafted. So it's different from the check the client does to make sure they're talking to the right server. A: I'll sum up the main reasons: It's possible for an attacker to spoof the server, which is why the client verifies the request is coming from the expected origin. This may be part of a more nefarious attack to allow the attacker to act as if they are the site's administrator. Also, the request's destination is determined by the server's identity. For example, when you send a request for /user/BobSmith.html to the server, the request gets sent to the server whose address matches BobSmith.html. Even though the HTTP protocol doesn't mandate that requests be sent to a specific server, this is how the standard works. The destination server has the authority to reject any request. Depending on the implementation of the server, this may be a nice way to restrict access to a specific resource. Q: How to test a filepath with @ (at) I'm trying to test a filepath that contains an @ character. At the moment I'm using the following: fileexists = InStr(path, "@" > 0
