Webcomics about video games Menu week in review: march 28 Good morning videogame and comic fans, there's something in the air today, if not this week. This is an excellent week to hear this week's podcast, basically I don't know what I'm going to talk about in episode 100 so I'm making this my main topic! Tales from the Vesper quadrant was a solid episode this week, we were treated to another of the wonderful Alysia Judge paintings, a nice backstory on the "What's New?" section, and what else do we need, play time. To break a new format record, see my comments about comics needing playtime to be more than reading, this is a fantastic example. Ever since the pandemic began, I've found myself drawn to websites that have some sort of live comics activity. That's not really what this is about, but I thought I would mention it, as going to talk about what makes a website a good place to read comic? I feel as though every comic blog has a "read our comics every day" and these blogs are way better than most, because they not only have a daily comic, but often full-length comics. This is a great place for short 3e33713323
