Oriental Rug of the '30s The Oriental Rug of the '30s reflects the oriental rug industry of its time, both in terms of techniques and materials used to create the rugs. The term 'oriental', as seen in this rug's creation, used to describe these rugs produced in the East. This rug is made of wool with a subtle pop of color. The rug goes by many names, such as textured shearling or oriental rug. The dominant motif is Japanese, though the rug is not as representative of a specific design as can be seen in other rugs of the time. References to other rugs in the time period such as the "Oriental rugs of Indian or Persian origin" are common. Some of the points of resemblance that are more obvious in the design is the pattern's placement and the tasselled fringe. Textured Wools of the '30s The textured wool of the '30s is a particular specialty of the Oriental rug industry. Unlike other carpets produced in the East, textured wool was a very popular and widely available and affordable product. Two different types of textured wool are used in the oriental rugs of the '30s: wool shag and tar. Wool shag was collected from wool that had been previously washed and brushed. Tar wool was collected from the wool of the sheep that had been shorn and allowed to grow again. Both types of wool were shorn in a different fashion. Shag wool, more commonly seen in the modern rugs, was shorn in long, evenly spaced bundles along the body of the sheep. Tar wool was shorn more roughly, with the pile bunched together on the sides of the sheep, forming a tuft of wool all in one bundle. A popular rug of the day, the oiled wool was created using e24f408de9
