1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a light source device and an endoscope having the light source device, and in particular, relates to a light source device with a function of adjusting the light amount of the light source and an endoscope having the light source device.

2. Description of the Related Art An endoscope used for the medical field is generally provided with a solid-state light source device including a light source unit containing a light source lamp and a light guide member, which guides the light emitted from the light source lamp to an illumination target portion such as an observation target. The light guide member is mainly a rod-shaped optical fiber, and a light-guiding section is generally formed at the end portion of the optical fiber to guide the light to the illumination target portion. Such a light guide member is needed to have high light condensing performance. Further, the light guide member needs to have a small diameter in order to reduce a diameter of the endoscope, and to obtain high condensing performance. In view of the above, as a light guide member, a light guide member including a step formed by, for example, grinding, in an end portion of an optical fiber is known. As a conventional light guide member with a step, for example, a light guide member having a light-guiding section at an end portion of an optical fiber having a diameter of about 5 to 10  $\mu\text{m}$  is known (see, for example, Patent Document 1). Patent Document 1: JP-A-2001-162750 However, in the light guide member having the light-guiding section formed at the end portion of the optical fiber, when the grinding processing is performed, the optical fiber may be broken. In addition, since an adhesion between an outer tube of the optical fiber and a protective tube formed of a soft resin is low, the protective tube is likely to be peeled off. In the case of the light guide member having a step, when the optical
