How to use a method using Thread as parameter in Java? This is a thread method which executes based on time: public synchronized void keepThread(){ } I am using this method in another method call. public void doAction(){ doSomething(); // [Actions must be synchronized.] Timer timer = new Timer(); timer.schedule(new TimeTester(), 1000, 0); } public void doSomething(){ keepThread(); doAnotherThing(); } Now my question is that doSomething() will not work because the above method is synchronized. As a solution to this issue I am considering using a second level of threading, like below public void doAction(){ Thread one = new Thread(new TimeThread()); one.start(); doSomething(); // [Actions must be synchronized.]

The invention relates to a circuit arrangement for giving a digital, analog and/or pulse-width-modulated control signal, and a method for producing a digital, analog and/or pulse-width-modulated control signal. Circuit arrangements of this type are known, in which a digital control signal, which can be converted into an analog control signal and a pulse-width-modulated control signal, are obtained by means of a digital-to-analog converter (DAC) and an analog-to-digital converter (ADC), respectively, and are subjected to digital processing and are then converted into a respective analog or pulse-width-modulated control signal via a respective digital-to-analog converter and analog-to-digital converter.

From German patent DE 197 09 200 C1 it is known to produce a pulse-width-modulated control signal, in which three separate loops are used, one for a digital control signal, one for an analog control signal, and one for a pulse-width-modulated control signal, whose basic pulse width is subdivided into a certain number of additional pulse widths in the generation of this pulse-width-modulated control signal, such that the pulse widths of the additional pulse widths correspond to a time period which is to be covered by a standard period of the control signal. The control circuit known from DE 196 51 946 C1 uses components which are similar to those which have already been described in the other documents. The configuration is therein composed of an analog-to-digital converter, a digital-to-analog converter, and a pulse-width-modulated output module. To obtain the analog control signal from the two signals which are generated via the digital-to-analog converter and the analog-to-digital converter, one component is used in common for the generation of the digital control signal and the analog control signal, that component being used for producing the analog control signal by means of the other component and for producing the digital control signal by means of the third component. The output signal of the pulse-width-modulated module is coupled via one line to the digital-to-analog

Dll language_pak2.dllThe collapse of the world economy in 2008 was, among other things, a huge, worldwide inventory overproduction problem: Too much stuff was made, and it wasn't being used up. Some have argued that this great British inefficiency was a classic case of market failure. Many economists argued that its scale and impact were so unlikely to be the result of market failure that it's more reasonable to suppose it was the result of government failure. But maybe that's just an excuse: In our G-20 meeting yesterday, I suggested that inefficiency on this scale and significance to the world economy could not be left to the free markets to solve. The problem had to be solved at the national level by governments, not just the IMF. Britain's Chancellor of the Exchequer, George Osborne, agreed. And when it comes to reshaping the UK economy's capacity for growth, he said, "We can't just sit back and wait." What has he done about it? Yesterday I reported a far more ambitious programme for the UK to cut down on "wasteful" domestic demand on behalf of industry, the biggest industrial sector in the economy. But what about the household sector? Osborne said there was now a problem with "people living beyond their means", and that was leading to a problem with "inflation
