The purpose of the present study was to reveal what nurses did in patients' death. Nursing students who were in their final semester were asked to participate. Of a total of 325 students, 131 completed questionnaires. The questionnaire included the standard definition of nurse-induced death. Respondents were asked to recall and describe what they did when they encountered a dying patient in order to control his/her symptoms. The majority of respondents found the death of a patient to be natural. Patients' discomfort, pain and agitation were poorly controlled, and alleviated by medication. More than 90% of students took many actions to control the patients' symptoms, but only 31.6% and 37.0% of them did the whole care, physical examination and communication, respectively.
