The AR receptor in the persistence of endocrine disruption in the reproductive system of the male Zebra Finch. The persistence of endocrine disrupting chemicals (EDCs) in the environment has been associated with their ability to bioaccumulate in animals. However, the process by which animals achieve bioaccumulation is not well understood. In the current study, male Zebra Finches (Taeniopygia guttata) were exposed to the EDC tributyltin (TBT) via oral gavage during the time of reproduction at 35 days posthatch and reproductive effects were evaluated at day 35, 80, and 105 after hatch. The TBT did not affect resting growth but reduced the number of nestlings by 24%.
