After two days, the stored dough is a putrid mess. So we experimented with a couple of products. We tried another version of King Arthur, so we made the dough according to the package directions, let it rise, made the loaf, then baked it. It turned out well, but the gluten was too little; the loaf wasn't as elastic as a traditional one. We tried a bread machine, making a simple white bread. Two days later, it was still delicious, but we couldn't stretch it to use it. We tried a different vegetable oil, olive oil that I used to use. If I lost all the oil, I'd be in real trouble: olive oil isn't a very good solvent for fat, water is. I used a half-cup of olive oil for every 5 cups of flour. It baked perfectly, but the loaf didn't rise. Ah, a stroke of good luck -- we found a couple of containers of dough, already rising, at a local Italian bakery. We left the lids off, and let the dough rise
