Moreover, patients from the observational cohort may have been referred to our center earlier than patients from the randomized cohort. Several randomized trials have been conducted to determine the appropriate length of surgery for gastric GIST, and the optimal perioperative management has been the focus of interest \[[@b19]--[@b24]]. Recently, Johnson et al. \[[@b24]] published their results of a randomized trial in which they compared laparoscopic versus open gastrectomy for the treatment of gastric GIST. The study showed that laparoscopic resection was associated with less blood loss and a shorter hospital stay compared with open surgery, and laparoscopic resection resulted in significantly better pathologic margins in the total cohort. There was no significant difference in the recurrence rate between the two groups, but the 1-year overall survival rate was significantly higher in the laparoscopic resection group. Although, there were a limited number of patients in each group, which may undermine the applicability of these data, the results of their study are encouraging and may encourage surgeons to consider the use of laparoscopy for the resection of gastric GIST. But it should be emphasized that surgical techniques have improved since the publication of this study. As mentioned above, laparoscopy provides adequate exposure in the procedures but still can be hampered by severe adhesions and fibrosis from previous surgery or chronic inflammatory disease, which may lead to difficulties in the successful completion of a minimally invasive gastrectomy. Moreover, it is time consuming to translate a conventional open procedure into a laparoscopic one. So we need to pay special attention to patient selection and development of a customized technique. Our initial study reported that the application of VATS in the treatment of gastric GIST might achieve good postoperative curative effects without increasing the morbidity and mortality \[[@b
