What is the role of PET scan with \[18F\] FDG in the management of patients with B-cell lymphoma? Despite its availability for over 30 years, the role of \[18F\] FDG PET scan in patients with non-Hodgkin lymphoma (NHL) remains controversial. Studies of both patients and tumor cells show high-grade NHL exhibit high metabolic activity, possibly because of an increased cellular need for glycolysis. Mature B-cell neoplasms (both low- and intermediate-grade B-cell NHL) in contrast exhibit low-level metabolic activity. In vivo data suggest poor specificity of \[18F\] FDG in patients with low- or intermediate-grade NHL. In-vitro data suggest that at high \[18F\] FDG doses, \[18F\] FDG can nonspecifically label immunoglobulin isotype of non-neoplastic cells, resulting in false-positive findings. Lesions without neoplastic cells can also exhibit false-positive results. In patients with higher-grade or advanced-stage NHL, the degree of \[18F\] FDG metabolism may be relatively uniform, resulting in good-to-excellent diagnostic performance of this modality. In patients with lower-grade and early-stage NHL, however, \[18F\] FDG PET scan is unlikely to be diagnostic. On the basis of these in-vivo and in-vitro studies, it is still difficult to recommend the routine use of \[18F\] FDG PET scan in the initial staging of patients with NHL. The role of \[18F\] FDG PET scan in patients receiving treatment for NHL seems more clear-cut. In patients undergoing treatment for diffuse large B-cell lymphoma (DLBCL), the addition of \[18F\] FDG PET scan to computed tomographic (CT) scan has been demonstrated to allow better staging, with a subsequent change in initial treatment in up to 30% of patients. In patients treated with rituximab-containing chemotherapy, a negative PET scan also seems to predict for a good response to therapy. Conversely, in patients with low-grade and early-stage B-cell NHL, especially follicular lymphoma, a negative PET scan is predictive of excellent treatment response. In patients with follicular lymphoma, \[18F\] FDG PET scan has
