Q: SQL Server fulltext search using dynamic where clause I have a database that has two tables. I'm going to store a set of data that will come to my application and I want to be able to use SQL Server fulltext search to find the record. I'm still learning SQL so this one has me kinda stumped. I have an initial table that holds a list of records. As well as an insert log table that is used to track which record is going where. My initial table has over 500 records and several fields including: ID, FirstName, LastName, Gender, JobTitle, Location, Phone, and Email. The logic is that each user has a unique UserID. I then have a second table that holds the searchable data. This table has a list of userId, UserFirstName, UserLastName, UserGender, UserJobTitle, UserLocation, UserPhone, and UserEmail. I will have an insert log for each record I insert into the searchable table. The purpose of the insert log is to track where each record goes. I have the ID from the searchable table and the ID from the initial table. I want to use some sort of query to get the initial table to return the data that matches the IDs that are in the searchable table. So the question is what SQL query can I use to search for multiple fields in a table with a UserID? Not just one value but multiple values for the same column. At some point I need to use the searchable table to narrow down the search. A: If you want to match "multiple fields" then you need at least one separate column or row with a list of values you want to match against in the same table. That being said, fulltext search is not the best way to do this. You're probably better off using a list of IDs, querying for the IDs and then joining to your tables with a LEFT JOIN on the ID columns. A query like this will return the first matching row in the initial table (if there are any matches) or the second if there are no matches for the given search term in the first table. `SELECT a.ID, a.FirstName, a.LastName, a.Gender, a.JobTitle, a.Location, a.Phone, a.Email FROM initialTable a`
