Org.rar,rarDonald Trump launched his presidential bid with an invocation of what he said was the most important topic in life. “The fact is, the country is going to hell,” he said. “We’re going to straighten it out.” His presidential campaign is a race against time to find a constituency, or voters, who can elect him to stop the “evident decline” of the United States. The grim vision – that of a country in decay – is one that Mr Trump has been advancing for years. He has promised to build a great wall on the southern US border to keep out drug dealers, murderers and rapists. He has vowed to make Mexico pay for the construction. He has called for the construction of a wall on the Canadian border. He has called for the elimination of gun control laws. He has talked of making Americans who want to leave the country “deport”. For the past week, Mr Trump has been describing his bid as a “narrative”, much like a thriller or soap opera. But he frequently appears in the media accompanied by a script that seems to be written for him. He has repeatedly cited the crime numbers – killings, rapes and drugs – to justify a national crackdown on illegal immigration. In a speech in Mobile, Alabama, Mr Trump said: “There are 28,000 people that have died on the southern border. Have you ever heard of that? Have you ever heard that?” If Mr Trump sees a “runaway train” of crime heading towards the US border, he says, what else could he be talking about? In a speech in St Louis on Thursday, Mr Trump insisted that the criminals crossing the border “are really bad people, you know, they’re really, really bad people. We’ve got to get them out of here, and we have no choice.♦
