Show MoreQ: Checkbox value not stored on post I have the following checkbox in a form : If I use the following piece of code (which is actually a js.erb function) to store the value : if ($('input[name=fields\\[\\d\\]]').is(':checked')) { $('input[name=fields\\[\\d\\]]').each(function() { var box = $(this); var id = box.attr('name').split('[')[1]; var str = $.map($('input[name='+id+']'), function(el) { return el.value; }); ... It stores all the values but the first one. When the form is submitted it only stores the last value and when the user unchecks the other boxes the post is empty. I'm pretty sure it has to do with the [] inside the name field, any idea how to solve this? A: My guess is that the name attribute of your checkbox elements have something after the square brackets (in which case you're appending the square brackets to the name field and not the name itself). See this for a reference: But try not to use the '[' unless there's a matching ']' (the empty square brackets are because they can't be removed in the raw HTML). It'll get you errors in older browsers, and it's simply not needed when using a submit button to submit the form. Q: javascript Array object vs Objekt I am working with the MEAN stack. Implementing a particular library called "ribbon" for some work I made on a customer application. In order to do my work I need to use my custom built library. Here the creator explain how it's working:

What's new in Fatal Hour: Roadkill:

Is a Mediocre Shooter As some of you have noticed, I have been porting the city of contrast spades and social issues rant to the 360(GL). It's a fact that first-person games are better in their respective platforms. Just about all PCs and consoles are first-person only. This means that there is an easier medium for the developer to control, generally speaking. But on the other hand, shooters in general don't make use of first-person. Hence why games like Gears of War and Bulletstorm shine. Guerrilla Games and Epic Games are masters at creating what my video rant was about, making the first-person perspective a bitter and sour pill for any shooting game. City of Rampage features a good story with interesting characters. It's in the genre of the games I mentioned earlier. The graphics are mediocre. Like most Nintendo-based games, the characters are appealing to a degree to its audience. And the voice-over is pretty entertaining. The story is tied in with your character at a certain point. It is something you should not have to do to move forward. Doing so again can get you stuck in the story. By that, I mean that by doing so, you'll unlock a side story that is not useful for the main story. I'll leave how to do this up to you to investigate. Gameplay is what I like the least out of the five things mentioned. You have only a handful of guns in the game, but they are well-made. The only weakness is the lack of gameplay. Your typical third-person shooter has a minimum of 4 targets and 4 enemies. But city of rampage has 2 enemies that come after you. In the game, there is a variety of missions and challenges that you have to complete in order to move onto the next phase of the game. Because there is only a handful of targets and four enemies, that allows the game to be more of "chase scene" than any traditional shooter. The more movement the lesser amount of bullets you take, basically. The gunplay is your typical shooter, as in the enemies fall in queues of death when taking shots on them. That should be enough of the gameplay to keep you interested. The game does have some RPG elements

Reverse the roles: Face the challenge of managing your company from a drug rep's perspective. Experience how pharmaceutical companies work with products that are supposed to make you feel good, how they learn about their bugs through scientific research, and how they keep their secrets under wraps so they can be first to market. Use a company's cash flow to buy advertising, research new drugs, and produce more products. Will you battle for market share? Or work with your competitors to find a common ground? Re-make the rules: Invent a new system for drug sales and production and create a new era of pharmaceutical business! 3 new product types, including the Super Drug, Booster Drug and Pharmacology Drug, will allow for more interesting products while keeping your core gameplay the same. Do it your way: Manage everything with automated production lines, or set up a fine manual order system to build a perfect stockpile of drugs in your labs. It all depends on how you want to play and which industries will suit your needs.Q: I am trying to build a simple mutable LRU cache. But it returns the error while initializing the class. Please help! My purpose is to implement an LRU cache using lists in C++. But I am not able to find out where I am going wrong in this code.
