Staged repair of large diameter vascular injuries in adults is increasingly being advocated, with concern that immediate repair may be associated with significant operative morbidity. Such concern is derived from the dismal results reported in the literature in terms of non-operative management of these injuries. The patients in this study represent those in whom non-operative management failed. This study reports the complications of staged repair in 16 patients with large arterial injuries with an emphasis on factors that may affect clinical outcome. Sixteen adult patients with large arterial injury underwent repair of 15 iliac, one femoral and one internal iliac artery injuries. Associated injuries were present in 12 patients, the most common of which was an associated bone fracture. Three patients, all with associated injuries, were managed by immediate repair. The remaining 13 patients underwent staged repair. Endovascular therapy (thrombolysis, stenting or both) was used in seven patients. All four limbs remained viable. There were no perioperative deaths. Five patients developed small pseudoaneurysms 6d1f23a050
