(This is not a drill) It's one of the most commonly accepted principles in modern life, in everyday life, and almost every day of the year. But from time to time, it feels like we're applying that same level of honesty to business or even to things that don't actually exist in real life. Like the other day, I had a conversation with the boss (me) who was asking about a bunch of writing he'd done that he wanted feedback on. I was in the middle of reading this feedback and something started to make me feel weird and that was that the boss hadn't included the actual content of the writing to go with the feedback. It was a great (and rare) example of how people try and compensate for their fears about saying or doing something wrong by exaggerating the risk around it or zeroing in on the worst scenario which forces you into the scenario with the closest matching outcome. I pointed out (because I care) that it felt like the colleague wasn't totally honest with me and while I'm ok with a weird story if it doesn't affect anything in my life, I'm not happy about even the potential for me to feel like I've been duped and that doesn't really sound very honest to me. And now, he's saying the same thing. So, what do you think? Is this a good time to be honest or should we just suck it up and go with what we think?Q: Efficient implementation of view to the first page I have this table in my form, which is saved to the database.
