The truth is that no one wins on the playing field, but only enjoys it to some extent. In our case, it also makes money. All I can tell you is that if I were you, I would probably do the same. Mark and I joked a lot about how we would like to live. Mark always said that he would like to have his own house, so that everything works the way he would like. I would like to have money and be able to travel wherever I want.

Wine Advocate New American Table Wines A. Food & Wine Magazine Tropical wine The Wine Checklist The Cookbook 4. TIPS FOR THE NON-EXPERT WINE CONSUMER By David Landis, pg. 35 Wine can be one of the best forms of selfexpression. It can be a mode of communication with each other, with yourself, and with a community. Nowadays, a casual person can enjoy and express themselves with wine as easily as they can read a book. They can have a taste for wine, not as a hobby or a work of art or by itself, but as a simple glass of wine. However, many wines are too simple, too boring, and too expensive to provide an enjoyable experience or change your mood. Why is this? Probably because no one has tried to teach them well what to drink and how to drink it. So let's start with you. Do you know a wine list or wine list of choices? Most lists of wines are not designed for a casual drinker. Nor are they designed for a wine lover. They simply serve a purpose. I've been on wine lists in restaurants, wine bars, and even in wine shops where they only have two wines, where the two wines are better than the other 20 wines, and where the two wines are typical of the 70 available. I've also been on lists that were prepared by a winemaker who had a particular style or type of wine in mind, and those lists were very good and very useful. I've seen menus with four or five choices of wine, and I've found that to be good. But most wine lists I've seen are incomplete and unhelpful to the casual consumer. To be complete, a wine list needs to include wines from all styles and all regions. For example, the average wine list from a restaurant in a university town might include wines from California, Oregon, Washington, New Zealand, and Australia. If these wines are usually dry, and if they are served by the glass and are of moderate price, then it's a pretty good list. But they should also include a few off-dry wines from New York State, France, Italy, and Spain to give you a touch of variety. These wines would not be served by the glass, and would cost a fair bit more, as they would be from the boutique wineries and independent merchants. You should know that many of these wines are dry or semi-dry and will be served c6a93da74d
