Legionella pneumophila, an opportunistic human pathogen, is an important public health concern. The fate of antibacterial agents in L. pneumophila is influenced by bacterial physiology and pharmacology. We have characterized the L. pneumophila-encoded MDR efflux pump, LpeA, which is active against many antimicrobials. This study aimed to determine whether LpeA is one component of a genomic efflux system and to examine the evolutionary history of the L. pneumophila multidrug efflux pump(s). The L. pneumophila genome includes a MDR efflux pump that is apparently composed of three loci: LpeA, LpuA, and LpeC. In an isogenic L. pneumophila strain, the three loci are expressed from the same promoter and are co-regulated. The proteins of the loci are well conserved and are encoded in the same operon, with one nucleotide change between the LpuA and LpeA. LpeA and LpeC belong to the resistance nodulation cell division protein family of efflux pumps and are orthologs to the multidrug-resistance efflux pump of Stenotrophomonas maltophilia. LpuA belongs to c6a93da74d
