The program is available for Windows, Apple and Linux operating systems. The DTSHD encoder is also available for the Apple and Linux operating systems, and costs around $50. This system begins by using the DTSHD program to encode a very basic stereo track using the three core streams. It then stitches the data together to form what is known as a joint-output core that the user will use in the final stereo product. A comparison of this joint output with the original unprocessed source audio indicates the quality that can be attained using the DTSHD encoder. This joint output encoder has been made possible by employing a multichannel engine with very powerful decoding hardware. A stereo audio joint output is obtained using the synthesized joint output, which, when rendered, gives the user a powerful piece of digital audio. Users have multiple tools at their disposal to properly implement this technology into their workflow, including selectable DTS-HD, DTS-HD Master Audio, DTS, DTS-In, SLS, and any G.711 u-law or a-law audio codec. The suite also includes a DTS HD Master Audio Bitstream Editor, which you can use to adjust audio to the DTS-HD Master Audio format, that comes without needing to purchase any software. Additionally, the media player also allows you to change files to the DTS HD Master Audio format. You can export the DTS HD master Audio file to MP3, MP4, FLAC, and WAV formats. The DTS Master Audio Decoder will export DTS or DTS-HD Master Audio as a separate track inside a 5.1 or 7.1 mix. This method prevents you from needing to open both DTS-HD Master Audio and a mix in the same instance. DTS-HD Master Audio Decoder and RTAS decoder. The RTAS decoder is capable of surround decoding with a Pro Tools LE or MPowered system, as long as six or more outputs are available, although the DV Toolkit is necessary to enable timecode features.
