The Muqaddimah is at the same time a social study and political work. The work is an attempt to understand the origin of the Islamic civilization which he did by reading the past history of the Islamic world. The Muqaddimah was written from the viewpoint of a Muslim, and Ibn Khaldun comments on the vicissitudes of time and different civilizations to show that the Muslim state could overcome all difficulties and that a revival was always possible. The Muqaddimah is a wide-ranging theoretical framework, or treatise, explaining the dynamics of society in a manner that would make sense to modern readers. Ibn Khaldun's analysis of why certain societies declined or prospered is in many ways strikingly similar to the modern concepts of social cycles and systemic collapse, though he lacked the concepts of sociological or cultural relativity to explain the decline of Muslim Spain and the fall of the Ottoman empire. [30] At the foundation of Ibn Khaldun's social analysis is the concept of the social body. He divided society into two parts: the [social] body and the [substance]. The [social body] consists of the population, material means, and rules of society. The [social body] has an independent existence outside the [substance] of society and is, in fact, a type of soul that governs and governs over the [substance] of society. The [social body] is constantly agitated by passions, and by the manifestations of these passions, the [social body] either progresses or declines. The [social body] has a life of its own, but this individual life is to a certain extent conditioned by certain internal conditions. These internal conditions include the social climate, the ruling family, its fortune, and the price of its situation. One of his most important works is the Muqaddimah, in which he outlined a concept of world history that continues to be the basis for all current theories of history. He first acknowledged a sequence of cyclic historical patterns in the past history of empires, states and civilizations. These patterns consist of four major periods, each of which is marked by powerful religious, political and economic leaders. He goes on to show how these cyclic patterns repeat themselves. The four phases are (1) the tribal society, (2) the city-state society, (3) the feudal society, and (4) the individual society. [31] 5ec8ef588b
