For each name and genre (kingdom, theology, nation), there is one restricted string (with an automatic link to a master list of all topics with their associated strings), and then one unrestricted string (with no automatic link). A hyperlink wraps the free form text and/or HTML around the (or em, or strong) tag. In a move that some critics have suggested was undemocratic, Italy's parliament passed a law last week that makes the remembrance of the Holocaust itself legally punishable. "Anyone who does anything to diminish or erase the Holocaust will be held legally responsible and it will be a crime," Italian Justice Minister Luciana Lamorgese stated. According to Italy's Tribuna Nazionale newspaper, the statute, which took effect on July 1, authorizes a prison sentence of three years for "denial of the Holocaust" and a maximum sentence of five years for "denigration of an individual person or people." The law "applies to all forms of denial of the Holocaust, not just of those by individuals or institutions, as had been demanded by critics of the law," the newspaper reports. "It applies to all societies, including Italy's post-fascist and neo-fascist ones," according to the Italian newspaper's investigation into the role of local fascist parties during World War II. Some political observers speculated in June that the government of Prime Minister Matteo Renzi, a former law professor, was trying to introduce a law that would put the Holocaust into the Italian legal system. "The addition of the term 'Nazi' seems to be aimed at the old neo-fascist and neo-fascist splinter groups," Gabriele Boccia, a Rome-based journalist, told the newspaper. "Of course, [they] are anti-Semitic and [anti-]Semitism is an Italian tradition that goes back for centuries." Boccia also told the newspaper that the law was a "strategic mistake" that could "create a big problem for Renzi in the coming months." The law was then published in full in the Italian press. "From now on, if someone doesn't want to be prosecuted for denying the Holocaust, he will have to go and write a book or say something in an interview," Boccia said. "This means that a Mafia or a neo-fascist group will never again be convicted of a crime for denying the Holocaust." The law also stipulates that prosecutors could take action against individuals "who use the cover of
